

The Little Lamp Who Wanted to See the Sea

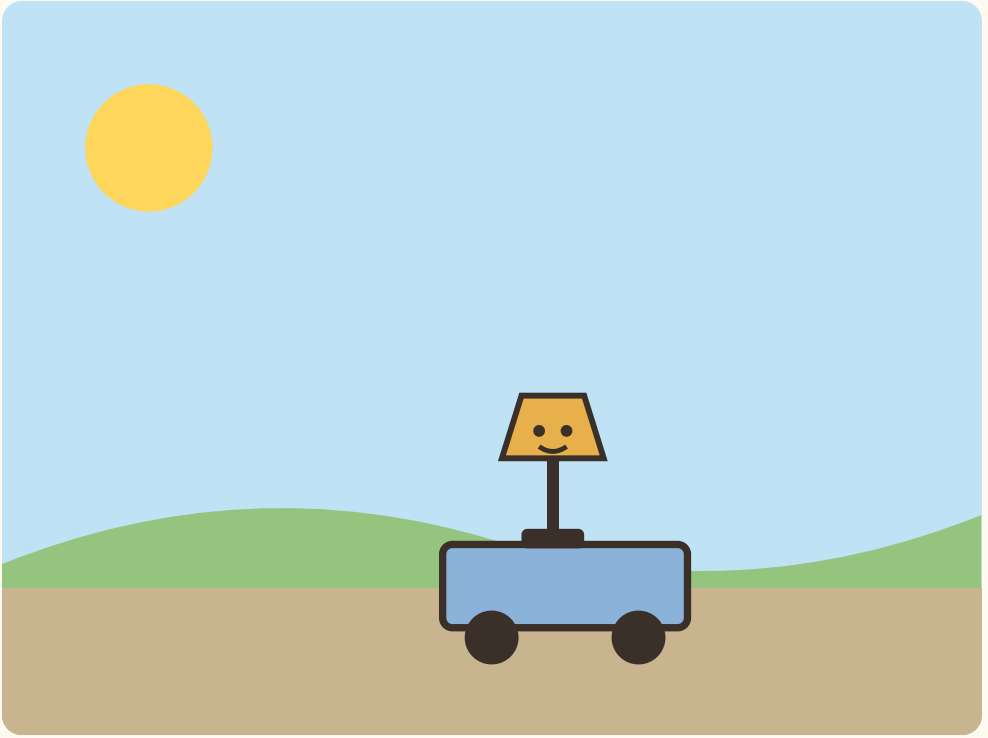

On a desk by a window lived a little lamp named Lumi. Every night Lumi glowed, so that the girl at the desk could read her books.

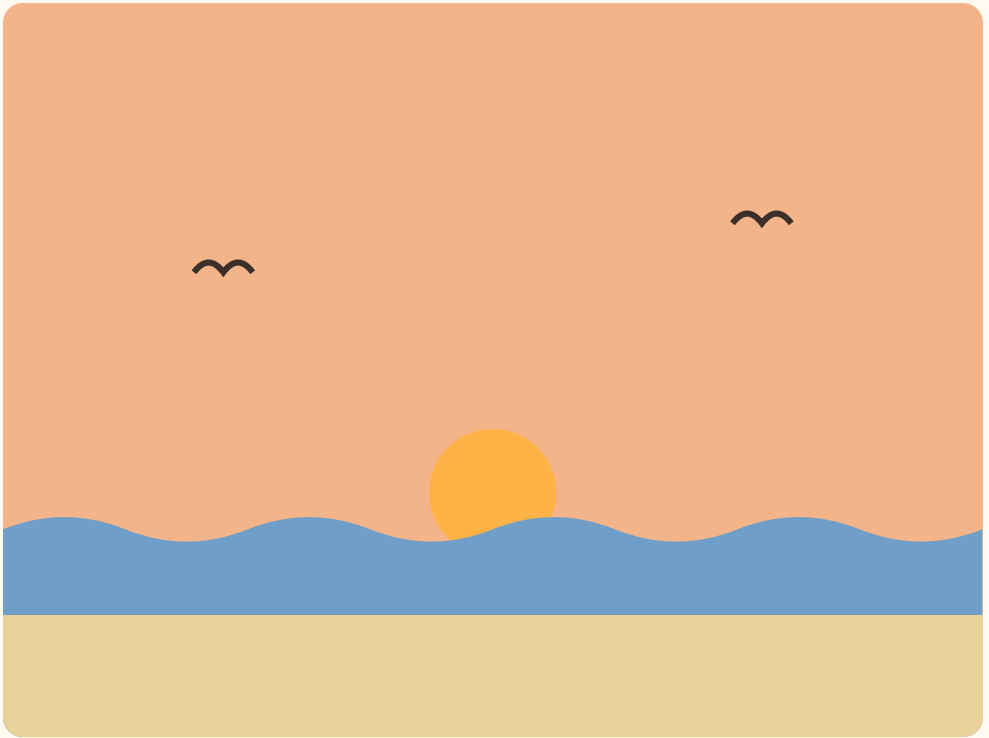

One of the books was about the sea. It had big blue waves, white birds and a little red boat. “I wish I could see the sea,” said Lumi.

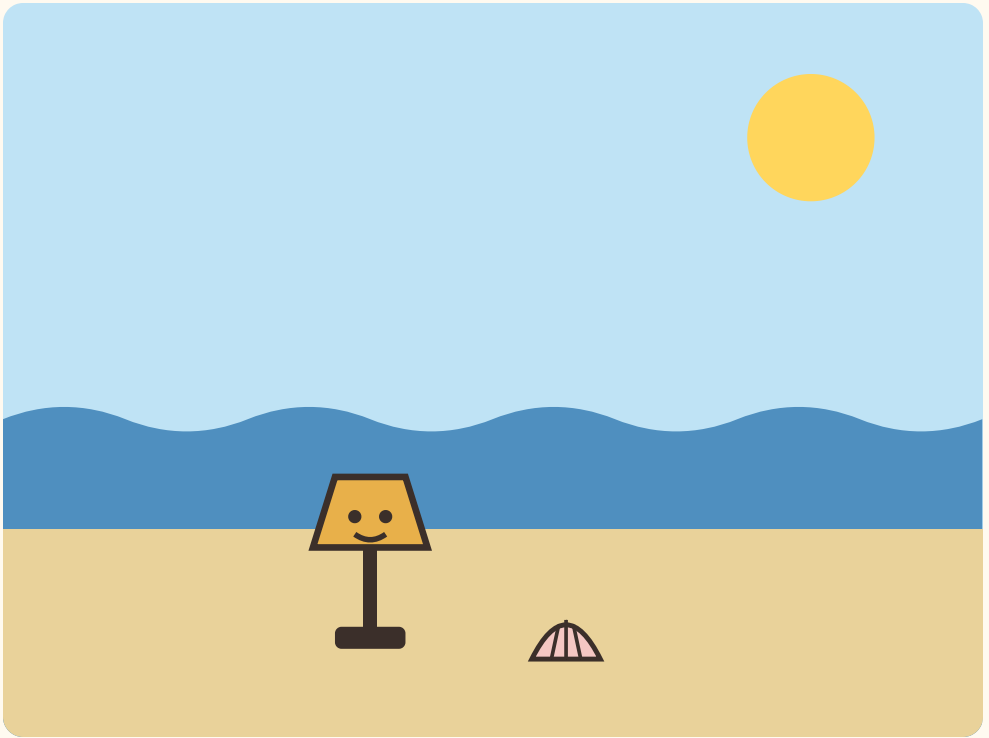

So one morning Lumi hopped down from the desk, out of the door and into the big wide world. Hop, hop, hop!

The road was long. A kind girl with a cart stopped. “Where are you going, little lamp?” “To the sea!” said Lumi. “Hop in!”

They rolled over hills and past fields, until the air smelled of salt and the sky grew wide. Then Lumi heard it:
shhh, shhh, shhh.

The sea! It was bigger than every page of the book. Lumi played in the sand and found a pink shell, as small as a button.

When night came, the sea was dark, and a little red boat could not find its way to shore. So Lumi glowed as brightly as a lamp can glow.

The boat saw the light and sailed safely home. “Thank you, little lamp!” called the sailor. Lumi felt warm all the way to the bulb.

The next night Lumi was back on the desk, glowing for the girl and her books, with a pink shell beside it. The End.
